They sat in silence, neither looking at the other, averting their eyes, not wanting to speak. Clayton Martin cut the overcooked pork chop with persistence and quiet determination, gnawing at the barely palatable meat until the effort made his jaw pop. The sound drew her attention. Clayton didn't want her attention. Not now. Not after the argument. Not after Edgar. Clayton seethed, thinking back on it all. He looked at her with disgust, then back at his plate. She can't even cook.

He said, "This meat is tough," stabbing another chunk.

"It's all there is," Emma replied flatly.

River's Getaway

by

TW Spencer

Through the crowd of the first gay bar River has ever entered, the teeth of the man's glare sank deep into the River's psyche. Venomous wormlike tendrils of doubt slithered through River's mind. Leslie "River" Riverton truly earned his nickname when he was six. Not because there are five generations of Leslie Riverton's with that nickname. Not a shortening of his last name. No, his nickname referenced his ability to slip into and out of any situation: good or bad.
